Gov. Noem asks Department of Education to delay social studies standards debate

South Dakota Gov. Kristi Noem announced Monday that she has instructed the Department of Education to delay changes to the state’s social studies standards up to one year to allow for more public input.

Noem’s move follows recent calls for her resignation made by the South Dakota Education Equity Coalition during an education rally in Pierre last Monday, and recent venue changes to the first hearing on the standards planned for Aberdeen next month after the DOE reported it’s seen nearly 600 public comments on the standards already.
The Department of Education changed the working group’s recommendations to the social studies standards significantly, but it is clear to me that there needs to be more public input to bring greater balance and emphasis on our nation’s true and honest history,” Noem said in a news release. "Following public feedback from several constituencies, it is clear there is more work to be done to get this right."

The DOE announced it was moving the first hearing to a larger venue a month later, likely to accommodate for more public comments, considering the nearly 600 submitted online and the more than 200 marchers who showed up in Pierre last week.

It's unclear when and where future hearings will be set up in the next year's time.

An Argus Leader review of the comments show the majority are in opposition to the proposed standards, in which the DOE removed more than a dozen explicit references to education on the Oceti Sakowin, initially included in an early draft proposed by a workgroup tasked with retooling the standards.

We will be delaying further formal action on the draft social study standards to allow more opportunity for public input, increased legislative engagement, and additional voices to be heard in this discussion,” Noem said in a statement. “Our focus remains the same: ensuring that South Dakota students learn a true and honest account of American and South Dakota history.”

Sioux Falls not 'open for business' with medical marijuana

The voters overwhelmingly endorsed medical marijuana statewide and across party lines. The mayor and the city administration were tasked with creating, and responded with, zoning rules so strict that there are only two places likely to qualify in the whole city on the Minnehaha County side. One is behind the airport and the other is by the wastewater treatment plant. Isn't that a hilarious response?

No thought given to ADA or accessibility, or creating economic growth for our local small businesses and startups. With this lack of leadership, most likely the only players to survive these childish and churlish games will be the big companies from out of state who can file the lawsuits and wait it out. Much is going to be spent by the city on legal fees from fighting the lawsuits filed by industry and special interest groups, only to have to allow it in the end, because it is the state law now. Do they really think this is what the people wanted! This is not "Open for Business" by any definition.

Number of cannabis licenses approved

Flandreau will be able to have three cannabis dispensaries once medical marijuana is allowed in South Dakota.
The city council unanimously approved the number and set license fees at $10,000 for an initial fee and $10,000 for a renewal under an ordinance passed Sept. 20. Alderman Brad Bjerke was not in attendance. Mayor Dan Sutton said the number is the same as the number of liquor licenses and the fee is in the middle. The suggested fee to start was $5,000.
“This is going to be an ever evolving and ever moving discussion going forward,” he said.

Pride flag allowed to remain

A group of parents wants a pride flag removed from a Flandreau middle school room, saying it interferes with education.
The group brought their concerns to the Flandreau School Board Sept. 13 but faced opposition from others who support a teacher’s right to display the flag. In the end, no decision was made because the issue was not a formal agenda item.
The flag also is allowed under federal law, said Superintendent Rick Weber.
“We respectfully attend this meeting tonight with concerns that teachers’ personal biases and opinions are infiltrating our children’s educations,” said Angela Klein, a spokesperson for a group of dozens of parents. “We are aware of what is being exposed to our children in the classroom, and do not want these distractions to interfere with their education.”
She said students have been silenced about their opinions, while all students should have the right to respectfully state their opinions without reprimand.
She asked who will decide in the future what is appropriate to have in classrooms and said only items directly related to the curriculum should be allowed.
“We strongly urge you to consider these students that are being distracted from obtaining education they are entitled to, or those that may be feeling uncomfortable, or even harassed, by being made aware of their teachers’ personal belief systems that may or may not align with their own,” Klein said.
Others spoke in favor of making the atmosphere welcoming and safe for all, including gender diverse children. Parent Kevin Burshiem supported the right to have the flag in school.
“We have to focus on a sense of belonging and a sense of safety at school,” he said. As a school counselor at Flandreau Indian School, “I had to advocate for all students, not a small group of students, not for a majority of students, but for all students.”
Despite voter approval, legal cannabis is on pause in South Dakota—everywhere except for a tiny town located on an Indian reservation, where the Flandreau Santee Sioux will open the state's first legal cannabis business.
Last fall, South Dakota became the first state in the US to legalize adult-use marijuana at the same time as medical cannabis when voters approved a pair of ballot measures. Little has gone to plan since then.

A lawsuit backed by the state’s Republican Gov. Kristi Noem may scuttle recreational cannabis, and bureaucratic and legislative roadblocks may delay the state’s medical-marijuana program from selling its first gram until mid-2022.

But starting July 1, anyone with a medical cannabis recommendation—from any state—will be able to walk into an old police station in Flandreau, a town of about 2,200 people forty minutes north of Sioux Falls, and buy legal marijuana at the Native Nations cannabis dispensary, owned and operated by the Flandreau Santee Sioux tribe.

The tribe is capitalizing on increased acceptance of cannabis as well as their legal rights as a sovereign nation to become the first legal cannabis business in South Dakota, said Seth Pearman, the tribe’s attorney general, in an interview on Wednesday.

Under an Obama-era Department of Justice memorandum, federally recognized Indian tribes with cannabis businesses that obeyed state law and kept weed out of the hands of criminals and minors were not priorities for prosecution. The Flandreau Santee first tried to open up a cannabis business in 2015, but chose to close up business—and burn its first crop—under pressure from law enforcement.

That meant waiting until South Dakota caught up to other states legalizing cannabis. After that happened last November, the Flandreau Santee pushed forward with writing and passing its own cannabis regulations that apply within the boundaries of its reservation.

Though the state won’t issue medical marijuana cards until November and though dispensaries won’t open until next year, the state’s medical-marijuana law still takes effect July 1.

In sum, all this means anyone buying cannabis on the reservation under the Flandreau Santee’s own cannabis laws—which are consistent with state law, while also being independent, in an arrangement called a compact—won’t risk prosecution once leaving the reservation, Pearman said.

“That individual will have legal protection under the law,” Pearman said. The tribe will issue medical-cannabis cards to anyone with a qualifying condition, but the tribe will also recognize anyone with a medical cannabis recommendation from another state.

And if the state Supreme Court dismisses the complaint brought by Noem and state law enforcement officials against Amendment A, the dispensary will also sell cannabis products to anyone 21 and over.

The state’s first cannabis business—a long but doable drive from nearby big cities without legal marijuana like Minneapolis—is already employing 15 people and could generate as much as $1 million in revenue a month, tribal officials told the Sioux Falls Argus Leader.

The Flandreau Santee already have a casino on their reservation, but cannabis “could get as big as gaming and be as viable of a revenue source,” Pearman said. “It will also provide jobs and economic opportunities, and fund programs [on the reservation, like housing, roads, and schools] where there have been deficiencies for decades.”

There’s still a possibility that Noem or other authorities in South Dakota law enforcement could decide to take action. That would be vastly unpopular—and it would also violate the reservation’s federally protected status as a sovereign nation, potentially triggering a legal battle.

For now, that seems unlikely.

“We’re all good for July 1,” Pearman said. “I haven’t had any communication otherwise.”
Meanwhile, Candi Brings Plenty, a member of the SDEEC and indigenous justice organizer with the ACLU of South Dakota, said the groups will persist in seeking Noem's resignation.

"She knows she's in for battle," Brings Plenty said. "She has awakened a sleeping giant. We have finally been counted to a sufficient standard this past census and now she sees the numbers. We will vote her out."

Noem intends to ask the South Dakota legislature to pass legislation codifying Executive Order 2021-11, which she signed in late July and prohibits any curriculum requiring or encouraging students to take positions against one another on the basis of race, sex or the historical activity of members of a student's race or sex.

That executive order also prevents schools from "politicizing education" by prohibiting curriculum requiring students to protest or lobby during or after school.

Noem also plans to ban critical race theory and action civics as the basis for instruction in South Dakota schools. Education leaders have said CRT is mostly taught in higher education, but also isn't the basis for instruction in the state's six public universities.
Construction begins on cannabis grow facility in Colman

The South Dakota Cannabis Company is under construction now in Colman. Footings were poured recently. The building is located directly south of The Dollar General Store and east of the storage units and Colman Building Center.

South Dakota Cannabis Company is under construction with an expected completion of mid-October. The company is owned by five investors who were friends at Dakota State University. The grow facility will be 12,000 square feet in a 100 by 120-foot building. It will include a lab so the company can extract cannabis for a variety of products. It will have 84 grow lights. South Dakota Cannabis will be a wholesale provider of products and won’t have a dispensary on site, said Logan Denning, one of the owners. “We will sell to the dispensaries. We’ll bring our product to them,” he said. The company will need a state permit before it can start growing any cannabis. Those are not available yet. Denning said the company hopes to have product first available in February or March. The group had wanted to invest in a business together and believe in medical marijuana, he said. “That’s what we believe in. That’s our goal is to help people,” he said. “We view it as a perfect opportunity to get into something together and something we could do to help our areas.” Colman seemed liked a good location to start the project, he said. The group is relying on a consultant and the latest technology to make the business successful. The company will create seven jobs to start and will hire temporary workers as needed to help with the plants. “Hopefully, we can bring some more jobs into town,” Denning said. Denning, who lives in Corsica, is in the transportation business. The others work in retail and oil companies.
The only other grow facility in the county is the one operated in Flandreau by the Santee Sioux Tribe.
The Moody County Commission adopted its policy for medical cannabis dispensaries but hasn’t settled on a license fee.
The commission voted to allow three dispensaries that must be 1,000 feet from churches, residents, parks, libraries and schools. They can be open 8 a.m. to 6 p.m., Monday through Saturday, except on federal holidays.
The county has about five commercial-zoned areas where placement of a dispensary may be possible, including the Interstate 29 exit at Colman.
With licensing, the county commissioners first talked about a $50,000 fee but last week said perhaps that is too high and considered some lower numbers without deciding on a final amount. One possibility discussed was $10,000 for the initial license and $5,000 for the annual renewal.
The higher number originally discussed is justified because of costs for patrolling the establishments. But it might also be too high, said chairwoman Carla Bruning. “I know we can justify it,” she said.
Brookings County is looking at a fee of $5,000, while Minnehaha County is looking at much more.
More drivers are showing up in court with tickets for being impaired, said State’s Attorney Paul Lewis. “We are seeing substantial issues. We’re seeing that driver very much impaired,” he said. “We do carry the social costs.”
Lewis also said the licensing requirements should prevent anyone convicted of felony distribution of drugs within the last 10 years from operating.
The commission will have a hearing on Sept. 21 and a second reading to approve its policy on Oct. 5.
